Architecture is more than constructing buildings. It combines creativity, culture, and functionality. Beautiful architecture often reflects the history and values of a community while also meeting the needs of modern life.

Many famous buildings attract tourists because of their unique designs. Architects carefully consider materials, shapes, and environmental factors when planning a project. In recent years, sustainable architecture has become increasingly popular because it reduces energy consumption and protects natural resources.

- For example, direct communication may be appreciated in one culture but considered impolite in another. Similarly, gestures that seem harmless in one country may have different meanings elsewhere. Successful intercultural communication requires open-mindedness, patience, and a willingness to learn about other perspectives.
