"Understanding Personalities"

Every person in the world has a distinct personality made up of different personal qualities. Psychologists study these traits to understand how people behave, communicate, and make choices in their daily lives. Two of the most common personality types that scientists analyze are extroverts and introverts. Understanding where you fit can help you choose better hobbies, improve your study habits, and build stronger relationships with your family and friends.

Extroverts are highly social individuals who feel energized when they are around other people. They are typically very open, loud, and friendly. They prefer working in large groups rather than working alone, and they happily express their thoughts out loud. On the other hand, introverts are usually calm, quiet, and careful thinkers. They prefer spending time alone or in very small groups. Introverts often pay attention to details and think deeply before they speak or make a plan. However, being an introvert does not mean a person is shy or dislikes others; they simply prefer quieter environments to relax. Most people are a mix of both types, which makes human society incredibly diverse and interesting.

1. What do extroverts typically prefer doing?
   a. Spending all of their time alone in quiet rooms.
   b. Working in large groups and socializing with others.
   c. Avoiding family parties and group projects.

2. Which quality is explicitly associated with introverts in the text?
   a. Being very loud and speaking without thinking.
   b. Happily expressing thoughts to strangers.
   c. Being calm, careful thinkers who pay attention to details.

3. According to the text, what is true about human personalities?
   a. Every person is strictly 100% extroverted.
   b. Most people have a mix of both introverted and extroverted traits.
   c. Introverts completely dislike other people.

4. According to the text, what does the word social mean?
   a. Enjoying doing activities with other people and meeting friends.
   b. Feeling very nervous and worrying a lot about exams.
   c. Forgetting important days and being late for class.

5. What is the main idea of this text?
   a. Introverts make better plans than extroverts.
   b. Scientists only study people who are loud and friendly.
   c. Human personalities vary, with extroverts and introverts showing different traits.

Part 3: Reading [15 marks]

"The Value of True Friendship"

Friendship is an essential part of shaping our personal identity during our teenage years. Having reliable friends gives us a sense of belonging and helps us navigate the challenges of growing up. However, being a good friend requires practicing specific positive qualities every day. True friendship is built on three main pillars: mutual trust, active listening, and celebrating each other's success.

First, trust is the foundation of any strong relationship. When a friend shares a private problem or embarrassment, a loyal companion respects their wishes and keeps it a secret. Breaking that trust can easily ruin a long friendship. Second, being a supportive friend means becoming an excellent listener. When a friend faces a problem, you should not criticize or ignore them. Instead, you need to listen patiently and offer helpful advice when they ask for it. Finally, true friends are never jealous of each other's achievements. For example, if your classmate gets a perfect score on a difficult science exam, you should praise them and express genuine happiness for their success. Supporting each other through difficult times and celebrating happy moments creates a bond that can last a lifetime.

1. What is described as the foundation of a strong friendship?
   a. Going to the mall together every single weekend.
   b. Building mutual trust and keeping private secrets.
   c. Getting identical grades on school exams.

2. What should a supportive friend do when someone is facing trouble?
   a. Criticize their actions and tell the whole class.
   b. Hang up the phone immediately to go to sleep.
   c. Listen patiently and offer helpful advice.

3. How should you react when a friend achieves something excellent?
   a. Feel jealous and hide your own school papers.
   b. Praise them and feel genuinely happy for their success.
   c. Remind them that they usually get bad grades.

4. Based on the text, what can be inferred about a person who shares your secrets?
   a. They are showing a lack of respect and failing to be a loyal friend.
   b. They are trying to help you make more friends in class.
   c. They are practicing their active listening skills.

5. What simple connection can be made between friendship and personal identity?
   a. Friendships are completely unimportant during adolescence.
   b. The friends we choose help shape who we are and how we grow up.
   c. Good friends only care about playing video games after school.

Part 4: Writing [40 marks total]

4.1. Expressing Your Opinion: Read the text and write your opinion about the topic. Write a paragraph explaining your thoughts and justifications. [15 marks]

Many community sports clubs and after-school activity groups are now passing strict rules that require teenagers to work in teams during every single session. Supporters argue that mandatory teamwork is highly beneficial because it forces quiet adolescents to become social, build trust, and improve their group communication skills. However, some introverted students and parents argue that forcing people into social groups is unfair to naturally quiet individuals. They believe that teenagers should have the personal freedom to choose independent projects or solo activities where they can comfortably work alone without unnecessary social pressure.

Question: What is your opinion on making group activities mandatory in clubs? Do you think clubs should force everyone to participate in team tasks, or should individual options be allowed to respect different personalities? Justify your opinion with reasons. (Write a short response of about 40 words).
