Text

Al Dhafra Festival

Last spring, I attended the Al Dhafra Festival, a traditional event that Bedouin tribes gather to celebrate their cultural heritage in. I helped my cousin, Omar, prepare our family's camels for the competition. Usually, Omar helped his father, but the old man's leg had been broken climbing over a fence the previous week. He was very competitive and had only passed the responsibility on under protest. I remember the morning of the festival clearly. "Everything needs to be perfect," Omar said in the cold dawn light.

As long as the camels were well fed and looked groomed, Omar believed we had a chance. "Providing we stay focused," he warned, "we can stand out." His confidence inspired me, though I had doubts about our lack of experience. I'd never attended the festival before, and I knew Omar secretly wished that he'd paid more attention in previous years. There was still a lot to do. The camels needed careful grooming and feeding if we hoped to influence the judges' decision. They'll recognise how amazing our camels are, won't they? I wondered, nervously.

The festival is highly competitive and the camels, which are judged on their beauty and strength, are a source of pride. Omar looked satisfied as he loaded the camels into the truck. When we arrived at the venue, I admired how modest many of the owners were, even though their camels were magnificent. Omar seemed quiet, but he greeted them politely and quickly made some final adjustments to our camels' decorations. Finally, it was our turn to be judged. "I wish your father had been more involved," I whispered to Omar, as we watched the judges with our camels. "If only he'd been able to help us."

Part 4: Inference Question
