Text

Khalid and Salem's New Business

Khalid was ambitious and had always dreamed of becoming an entrepreneur. After months of planning, he finally shared his idea with his best friend, Salem, who immediately recognised its potential. Together, they launched a small start-up selling customised phone accessories.

"If we combine your creativity and my organising skills, we can make this work," Salem said confidently. Now, they focused on preparing for their biggest challenge yet — a local event where they would showcase their affordable products.

For weeks, they had been researching the event. "There's a lot of competition," Salem said anxiously.

"Don't worry. If our booth stands out and highlights the quality of our products, we'll definitely attract customers," Khalid reassured him. With a tight 500 AED budget, they had to be careful. "Let's spend 200 AED on decorations and use the rest for printing flyers," Khalid suggested.

Advertising became their priority with Khalid focusing on designing social networking posts, while Salem packed products and secured a payment device. By the day of the event, they had perfected their setup.

However, disaster struck when a display shelf collapsed under the weight of their products. "This is terrible," Salem groaned, staring at the scattered phone cases. They quickly rearranged their items directly on the table instead. Khalid worried that customers might struggle to see the products, but Salem was slightly more positive about the situation. "It's not perfect, but it'll do," Salem said, attempting to motivate his friend.

Despite the difficult start, customers started arriving at the event. "What if no one buys anything?" Khalid whispered nervously.

Salem patted his shoulder supportively and replied, "By the time the event ends, we'll have learned a lot — whether we sell anything or not."

Write your answer below. Use full sentences.
