Part 4: Inference

Text

Jassim's Journey

Jassim was confident he would qualify for the karate tournament. Considered the best athlete his team had, he rarely questioned his ability and believed his selection was inevitable. But one afternoon, just as he was on the point of landing a high kick, he lost control and fell hard. This resulted in a sharp pain in his leg that felt far worse than any injury he had previously experienced.

At the hospital, doctors spoke of considerable damage to both muscle and bone. However, Jassim hoped for a quick recovery. A high fever and severe pain indicated that the injury was serious, and doctors warned that he would need several months to heal. If he hadn't remained optimistic, he would have fallen into depression. His dream of competing hadn't gone completely, though he feared it was disappearing fast.

By the time selection day came, Jassim had tried his best to prove that he was still a good athlete. He could manage the most basic techniques, with great effort, though his leg still ached terribly by the end of each session and the high kick, his most powerful and important move, had yet to be attempted. His coach observed him closely during training. "You were on the point of giving up, but you've shown determination," his coach said. "If you'd slowed down during recovery, you wouldn't even have achieved this much. The progress you've made is... encouraging." His coach appeared enthusiastic, but then he sighed deeply, staring at the ground between them, and walked away.

Later, Jassim saw the team list pinned to the wall. After studying it for a moment, he turned and silently left the room.
