Nail That Job – My Dream Job and How I Plan to Get There

My dream job is to become an environmental journalist because I believe that raising awareness about climate change is one of the most urgent responsibilities of our generation. I once heard a journalist say that "words can change the world," and I completely agree. Through writing and investigation, I want to inform people, challenge governments, and inspire collective action.

Many argue that journalism is a stressful and unstable career, but I see it as a field where passion and purpose outweigh financial security. In my opinion, no job is easy, yet the most rewarding ones demand persistence and courage. I also believe that technology has transformed journalism, offering countless ways to reach global audiences through podcasts, blogs, and online articles.

To achieve this goal, I plan to study communication and environmental science, gain experience through internships, and keep improving my writing skills. For me, success means making a difference, not just earning a salary.

1. What is the writer's opinion about journalism as a career?

Nail That Job | Career Trends in a Changing World

The world of work is changing faster than ever before. Traditional careers are being reshaped by technology, automation, and remote work. In my opinion, flexibility and continuous learning have become the most valuable skills in today's job market. Gone are the days when people stayed in one company for their entire lives. Now, professionals must adapt to new tools, trends, and industries to stay relevant.

Recent studies show that careers in digital marketing, data analysis, and artificial intelligence are expanding rapidly, while some routine jobs are disappearing. This transformation can be both exciting and frightening. Some people argue that constant change creates insecurity and stress, while others believe it opens endless opportunities for innovation and creativity. I agree with the latter view—adaptability makes work more dynamic and rewarding.

To succeed in this changing world, individuals must invest in developing soft skills such as communication, critical thinking, and teamwork, alongside technical knowledge. Those who embrace lifelong learning are more likely to thrive. In short, the future of careers belongs to those who are willing to evolve.

Nail That Job | Creating a Vision for Your Career

In today's competitive world, having a clear career vision is essential for long-term success. Many people start working without a specific plan, but I believe that setting a vision gives direction, motivation, and purpose. A career vision helps individuals identify their strengths, define their goals, and make informed decisions about education and skill development. It turns dreams into achievable steps rather than random opportunities.

Experts often say that a strong career vision should be flexible, not rigid. As industries evolve, professionals must adjust their goals to match new realities. For example, someone who once dreamed of being a journalist may now explore digital content creation or media strategy. This adaptability allows growth while staying true to one's core interests.

Some argue that planning too far ahead limits creativity, but in my view, a clear vision doesn't restrict—it empowers. It gives people a sense of control and helps them focus on what truly matters. Without direction, talent can be wasted on short-term choices. Therefore, building a thoughtful, flexible career vision is one of the smartest investments anyone can make.

What is the writer's opinion about creating a career vision?
Do you agree or disagree with the writer's opinion? Why or why not?

Money Talks – The True Value of Wealth

People often say that "money can't buy happiness," yet it undeniably plays a major role in shaping our lives. In my opinion, money itself is neither good nor bad—it's how people use it that determines its value. Financial stability allows individuals to meet their basic needs, pursue education, and plan for the future. Without it, even simple tasks like paying bills or visiting the doctor become stressful.

However, I disagree with the idea that wealth automatically leads to success or satisfaction. Numerous studies show that once basic needs are met, higher income does not necessarily increase happiness. True fulfilment comes from meaningful relationships, personal growth, and a sense of purpose. Many wealthy individuals still feel isolated or pressured, proving that emotional well-being cannot be purchased.

That said, I acknowledge that financial independence gives people freedom and dignity. Money is a tool—it can open doors, but it cannot define who we are. The real challenge lies in balancing ambition with gratitude and generosity.

Comprehension Questions

1-What is the writer's opinion about money and happiness?
2-Do you agree or disagree with the writer's view? Explain why.

Write an argumentative text (around 200 words) responding to the issue raised in the passage. Support your ideas with examples and reasons.

Prompts to guide your writing:

- Do you believe that money brings happiness or just comfort?
- How important is financial success compared to emotional or social success?

Consumerism and the Human Brain

Modern society constantly encourages people to buy more—new clothes, faster phones, and endless online deals. In my opinion, consumerism is not only an economic system but also a psychological trap. Studies in neuroscience show that shopping activates the brain's reward system, releasing dopamine—the same chemical linked to pleasure and addiction. This means that buying often makes us feel good temporarily, but the effect fades quickly, pushing us to spend again.

Some argue that consumerism drives innovation and creates jobs, which is true to some extent. However, I disagree with the belief that material possessions bring long-term happiness. When people measure success by what they own, they risk losing sight of personal values, relationships, and mental balance. Constant exposure to advertisements shapes our desires and even influences how we think about ourselves.

In my view, awareness is the key to freedom. Understanding how the brain reacts to consumer culture helps us make conscious choices rather than emotional ones. True satisfaction comes from purpose, not purchase.

What is the writer's opinion about consumerism and its effect on the human brain?
Do you agree or disagree with the writer's view? Explain briefly.

Does consumerism improve or damage people's well-being?

Write an argumentative text (around 200 words) expressing your opinion on this topic. Support your ideas with examples and reasons.

Prompts to guide your writing:

Making a Profit and Helping People

Many people believe that business is only about making money, but I strongly disagree. In my opinion, the best companies are those that balance profit with a sense of social responsibility. Earning money is important—it keeps businesses alive and allows them to grow—but it should never come at the cost of harming people or the environment.

There are countless examples of companies that succeed while doing good. For instance, firms that invest in fair trade, renewable energy, or community projects show that profit and purpose can coexist. Research also proves that consumers are more likely to support brands that care about ethics and sustainability. On the other hand, when companies focus only on profit, they may exploit workers or damage nature, leading to long-term loss of trust.

I believe that real success lies in creating value for everyone, not just shareholders. When businesses help society, they build loyalty, respect, and a better future for all.

1-What is the writer's opinion about the relationship between profit and helping people?
2-Do you agree or disagree with the writer's view? Explain your answer.

Write an argumentative text (around 200 words) expressing your own opinion on this issue. Support your ideas with examples and reasons.

Prompts to guide your writing:

- Should companies focus mainly on profit, or also on helping people?
- How can businesses balance financial goals with social responsibility?

<ul> <li>Do you think consumers should support companies that act ethically, even if their products cost more?</li> </ul>

The Ups and Downs of Entrepreneurship

Entrepreneurship is often seen as the path to freedom, innovation, and financial success. In my opinion, being an entrepreneur is both exciting and exhausting—a journey full of opportunities but also challenges. Starting a business allows people to follow their passion and create something of their own. It encourages creativity, independence, and problem-solving. Many entrepreneurs say they enjoy the thrill of turning an idea into reality, even when the road is uncertain.

However, entrepreneurship is not for everyone. It demands long hours, financial risk, and emotional strength. Studies show that many new businesses fail within their first few years, often due to poor planning or lack of experience. Some people argue that job security is more valuable than independence, and I understand their point. Still, I believe that failure can also be a powerful teacher.

In my view, entrepreneurship is a test of resilience. Its ups and downs shape a person's character and vision. Those who learn from setbacks often become the most successful in the long run.

What is the writer's opinion about entrepreneurship?
Do you agree or disagree with the writer's point of view? Explain briefly.

The Ups and Downs of Advertising on Consumers

Advertising plays a powerful role in shaping consumer behavior and modern culture. In my opinion, it is both beneficial and harmful, depending on how it is used. On one hand, advertising helps companies introduce new products, boost competition, and inform consumers about choices. It fuels economic growth and even inspires creativity through clever marketing campaigns. Without advertising, many businesses would struggle to reach their audiences, and consumers might miss useful innovations.

On the other hand, advertising can easily become manipulative. Studies show that constant exposure to persuasive messages can create unrealistic expectations, materialism, and impulsive buying habits. For children and teenagers especially, targeted ads can distort self-image and influence unhealthy consumption patterns. Some critics argue that modern ads often appeal more to emotion than to logic, encouraging people to buy things they don't need.

I believe the key lies in balance. Responsible advertising should inform rather than deceive, and consumers should learn to evaluate messages critically. Awareness and media literacy can help people enjoy the positive side of advertising while avoiding its psychological traps.
