Reading

“The Festival of Words”

In a small traditional village, everyone valued education and respect for the elderly. Each year, the people gathered in the central square for the Spring festival, a time to share happiness and stories from the past.

This year, a young poet named Samira was chosen to represent her school. She wrote a poem about how learning connects the modern world with the old traditions. When she stood before the crowd, she felt nervous but comfortable seeing her grandmother smiling proudly in the front row.

The village leader raised his hand, and the people began to chant Samira’s words together. Their voices echoed through the air, mixing old melodies with new rhythms. Even the oldest residents nodded in approval, touched by how beautifully she joined the two worlds.

After the reading, Samira was invited to a wedding that same evening, where her poem was recited again as a blessing for the couple. The day ended with music, laughter, and a feeling that knowledge and love could bridge every generation.
