Text

Maya and Salama

Sisters, Maya and Salama, grew up in a beautiful, quiet village near Fujairah. When they were little, they looked just like each other and had the same ambitions. When anyone asked them what they wanted to do when they were older, they both had the same answer, "We plan to live together here in the village and work as teachers in the school." Salama even gave lessons to her younger cousins. She loved telling people what to do! However, the older they got, the more different they became. Maya became interested in working in environmental science. Salama declared that she wanted to live abroad and do a job which involved travelling.

Maya decided to study clean energy techniques. She planned to stay near home and work in the UAE's green power industry. However, she decided that there were more work opportunities in other countries, so she took a job working in South Africa. When Salama went to visit Maya, she was surprised how much she missed her village and the familiar people there.

Salama's career path was more complicated than Maya's. At first, she said that her perfect job would be to travel the world as an airline pilot. She chose to study aviation at a university in Saudi Arabia. To help pay for her studies, she took on a role tutoring other students. She loved to see how her instructions helped them to learn quickly. Although she enjoyed living in Saudi Arabia, she began to miss her village and family more and more as the time went on. I can't wait to go home! she often found herself thinking. Salama found the course challenging, but she studied hard and was invited to apply for a pilot training programme. However, Salama decided that she was beginning to change her mind about the type of job and lifestyle she wanted. She thought about how much she had admired the university professors who cared so much about education. She loved how they were such good role models and encouraged their students to be open-minded and confident.

After a lot of thought, Salama messaged Maya. I've come to an important decision about my future, the message read.
