Wedding Planners

Amna and her mother sat at the table, their minds full of wedding plans. Amna was excited - her latest idea had more potential to transform the celebrations into an unforgettable event than anything thought of previously. After all the time we've spent discussing it, mother must agree with what I want, she thought with optimism.

Her mother spoke gently, "So many people want to come and celebrate with you, but you talk as though you don't care about them. Amna, our customs are a part of who we are, and they are the traditions we've continued for generations. A wedding is one of the finest demonstrations of cultural appreciation that any family can offer. I thought we had already settled on the arrangements with your groom's family. You know, your sister had such a beautiful day, and yours will be just as memorable."

"I'm just thinking that we could reduce the guest list to close friends and family, so that we can use the fantastic venue I've discovered," Amna countered. "Foreign destinations are being used for all kinds of occasions now. Paris would be by far the most exotic and exciting place that anyone could possibly get married." My mother is a reasonable person, Amna thought, looking hard for some recognition of her wishes from the older woman. "To be honest," Amna continued, "I had been thinking about the dress you selected. It would be my honour to wear it."

Her mother finally became more animated. "Well, of course, you'd look lovely in it. I believe it's the ideal choice for you, and I'm happy to see you beginning to respond to my advice," she said, smiling.
