A New Business

Aisha had always been an ambitious individual, driven by enthusiasm and determination. Over several years, she had built a solid career in marketing, where she had perfected valuable business skills and knowledge. However, the desire to become an entrepreneur and establish her own company had never faded. My dream is being forgotten, she reflected with regret. Determined that her ambition be fulfilled, she resolved to take decisive action, convincing herself that the entrepreneurial expertise she lacked could be acquired through practical experience as she developed her business.

Her friends, however, spoke as though her plan had already failed, urging her to remain in her secure and well-established role - one in which she truly excelled. Yet, refusing to let self-doubt and apprehension consume her, she pressed forward with her vision. Through years of careful research into the fashion industry, Aisha had come to believe that her innovative concept, an environmentally sustainable clothing line that combined contemporary designs with traditional craftsmanship, was perfectly aligned with current consumer demands. Her professional experience had also allowed her to make strong connections with high-profile fashion influencers and media personalities, many of whom now promised their support in promoting her unique products.

However, just two days before the official launch of her store, her marketing team abruptly cancelled the arrangements they had made for the opening event. While it was believed that the demand for eco-friendly clothing was among the fastest growing trends in the market, Aisha knew that capitalising on it would be far more difficult without an impactful marketing campaign. How can I expect customers to engage with my brand without the visibility I need? she wondered, her mind racing for a solution. Without hesitation, she reached for her phone and called the first of several trusted contacts - individuals that she
