Read the following passage and answer the questions:

A Room with a View: Shared Living in University

For many students, the journey into higher education begins with a new and exciting experience: living in a residence hall. These buildings, also known as a dormitory, are at the heart of the campus and are designed to provide a comfortable home base. Moving in can be a big step, but it's all part of the challenge to get through college.

Living in a dormitory means sharing a space, often a single bedroom, with another student. It's a great opportunity to build a close relationship with a roommate and make lifelong friends. These living spaces are full of different facilities and amenities to make life easier, like common areas for studying and socializing, laundry rooms, and kitchens. There are also different types of housing, such as a cooperative, where students share responsibilities, or special-interest housing, which is designed for students with shared hobbies or cultures.

One of the most important lessons to learn in shared living is how to keep clean and be considerate of others. Students quickly learn to get around town using public transport and find ways to save money on food and entertainment. While some students may be tempted to live a lie or keep something secret to fit in, most find that being authentic is the best way to thrive. Ultimately, shared living is about finding a way to survive and thrive together, making the transition to university life a little less daunting.
