VI. Reading Comprehension & Summary Making: (170 Marks)

Read the following passage carefully, then answer the questions that follow:

In cities around the world, parks, public gardens, and tree-lined streets are becoming more than just pleasant views. These "urban green spaces" are now understood to be vital parts for creating healthy and happy urban environments. As concrete spreads, the awareness to protect natural areas within a city is vital for three main reasons: environmental, physical and mental health.

From an environmental viewpoint, green spaces act like a source of oxygen. Trees and plants absorb carbon dioxide and harmful chemicals, effectively cleaning polluted air we breathe. They also provide essential shade, which helps to lower temperatures in the extremely hot "urban heat islands" during the summer. Furthermore, parks and gardens absorb rainwater and reduce the risk of flooding after heavy rain. This natural discharge is a good solution to a common urban problem.

For residents, the benefits are quite clear. Parks provide free and available places for recreational exercise, such as walking, cycling, or playing team sports. This easy access encourages a more active lifestyle for people of all ages, which helps prevent health issues like obesity and heart disease. Perhaps less obvious, but equally important, is the mental health benefit. Several studies show that spending time in nature, even a small city park, can lower stress levels, reduce anxiety, and improve mood. It offers a peaceful resort and a visual break from the landscapes of urban life. For children, these spaces are essential for developing a connection with nature.

Despite these significant advantages, many city councils face a constant problem. There is often intense pressure to use empty areas for new housing or commercial buildings, which provide immediate tax income and economic activity. Protecting or creating a park is sometimes viewed by city councils as a less profitable use of highly valuable urban space.

However, urban planners increasingly argue that green spaces are an essential long-term investment, not a luxury. They boost property values in surrounding neighbourhoods. In addition, reduce public health costs by creating a healthier population. They also make a city a more attractive place for people to live in, work or visit. The challenge is to shift the viewpoint and persuade everyone that green areas and trees are not wasted lands, but vital keys for a fortunate future.
