Oman has a long history and many beautiful traditions. People work hard to protect their culture and pass it from one generation to another. Family, schools, and the community all have an important role in keeping Omani identity strong.

Traditional clothes are an important part of Omani identity. Many people wear traditional clothes on special occasions, weddings, and national celebrations. Men often wear the dishdasha and kumma, while women wear beautiful traditional dresses. These clothes show the beauty of Omani culture and make people feel proud of their heritage.

Omani people also protect their traditional food. Families prepare special dishes such as shuwa, harees, and Omani halwa during celebrations and family gatherings. Parents often teach their children how to prepare these dishes. In this way, traditional food continues to be an important part of family life.

Traditional crafts are another important part of Omani heritage. Some people make beautiful products using palm leaves, silver, and other local materials. These crafts show the skills and creativity of Omani people.

Young Omanis have an important role in protecting their identity. They learn about their culture from their parents and grandparents. They also visit museums, forts, and historical places to learn about their country's history. Schools organise activities that help students understand and respect their heritage.

By wearing traditional clothes, enjoying traditional food, protecting traditional crafts, and learning about the past, Omani people can keep their identity strong. Everyone can help protect Oman's culture and pass its traditions to future generations.
