Reading

Reading Comprehension:

Directions: Read the passage and answer the questions.

- (1) Scientists have spent years researching the brain, but for many of us the teenage brain is still a mystery. To understand what makes teenage brain special, we have to look at how people learn.
- (2) The brain is made up of a network of connections. When people learn something, a new connection is made, and the new information is sent to a different part of the brain, where it becomes a memory.
- (3) Every time we use the new connection, the information is sent faster and more easily - but, if the connection is not used enough, it will grow weak and will soon stop existing. This is why when you've taken the same route for years, it's not necessary to pay a lot of attention to where you're going. However, when you're walking a route you've taken only once before, you might have trouble remembering the way.
- (4) Teenagers must keep in mind that their brains haven't actually finished growing yet. Some areas - like the front part, which helps people decide if something is a good idea or not - develop slowly. This means that the teenage brain isn't very good at recognising danger.
