The end

Language Builder

In American English, have/has to is used more often than must to express obligation or necessity. For example: We have to follow the rules.

Language Builder

Past obligation can be expressed with had to. For example: She had to do her chores. The past form of must, however, expresses past probability when we feel certain that something was true in the past. For example: He must have forgotten about the meeting. (I believe this is true because he is not here.)
