Language Builder

Explain the difference between on sale and for sale. While for sale describes any merchandise that can be bought, on sale refers to merchandise that can be bought at a discount, or at a lower price than the regular selling price.

Teaching Tip

Begin each class with a five-minute Show and Tell. Invite students to talk about an interesting event that happened or a special occasion. Or they might bring in some fascinating item to show and describe to the class.

Additional Activity

Activity 1: Have students work in pairs to write down all the clothing items and accessories (including jewelry) that they are wearing. Each pair should compile one list. Have students read their lists aloud. Award a point to pairs for each word that no other pair has written. The pair with the most points wins.

Activity 2: Have students bring in clothing ads from department stores. Have individual students choose one outfit or piece of clothing they like and one they don't like. Have them write a description of each outfit and say why they like or don't like it. Have them share their work in small groups.

The oldest independent department store in the world is Austin's in Derry, Northern Ireland. It has been open for business in the same location since 1830. It is 5 years older than Jenners of Edinburgh, 15 years older than Harrods of London, and 25 years older than Macy's of New York.

Language Builder

Explain that certain items such as T-shirts, shirts, and sweaters come in sizes extra small, small, medium, large, and extra large. The answer to the question What size do you wear? is I wear a (medium). We use the indefinite article a or an with the size. We can also ask What size do you take? and answer I take an (extra large).
