You see a young executive in a public place staring into his laptop and you think: "Oh, poor guy, he's working so hard." But, in fact, perhaps he's looking at Facebook or Skype. Perhaps he's chatting online with friends or watching a video from his family who lives far away. The Internet makes it easy to communicate. Lots of people share photos and videos with their family and friends. Webcams also make it possible for others to see you when you are talking online.

But web videos and webcams are much more than that. They are becoming popular tools for e-learning. Many teachers today show web videos in their classrooms. What better way to help students understand geography or science. And there are thousands of video clips to choose from—you can see active volcanoes, the latest developments in technology, or learn more about global warming. For some students and teachers, the Web is their classroom. More and more students are taking online lessons. Some language students, for example, learn on their own from websites, and others connect with their teacher online with the help of a webcam. There are also online schools like the Khan Academy with over 3,000 video lessons in math, science, economics, and history—and it's absolutely free. Do you want to know how to make a cheesecake or learn how to play golf? Free how-to videos online can teach you. Anyone can e-learn, and it's easy!

Bison

Imagine what it would be like if most of your food came from one animal. For the indigenous people who lived on the wide grasslands of North America, bison were that animal. Bison were also called buffalo. They were a vital source of food. Their skins provided materials for clothing. Bones were used for tools. The Great Plains tribes lived their lives around hunting these animals. Today, no one totally relies on the bison for their way of life. Still, they are important to American history and culture. They were the first national mammal of the United States.

Bison are plant-eaters. They roam around the plains and prairies of North America. Male bison weigh up to 2,000 lbs. Females weigh around 1,000 lbs. The males and females both have horns up to two feet long to defend themselves, and they aren't friendly. They can be aggressive to humans and other animals. They're also able to run up to 40 miles per hour and jump nearly 6 feet into the air. Bison may be large and heavy, but they can move!

Bison have a dark brown shaggy coat with a fluffy hairstyle around the horns and small beards. During the winter they have been known to dig through deep snow to try to get a meal from the grass underneath. With all the insulation from their fur and fat, they stay warm while digging in the snow.

Bison travel in family groups. Mating season comes in mid-summer, and calves are born in the springtime. Bison only have one calf at a time. Their pregnancies are a little longer than humans'—about nine and a half months. That means each calf is an important addition to the family group.

If you visited the plains of North America three hundred years ago, you would find millions of bison. They roamed free from northern Mexico all the way up to southern Canada. After Europeans arrived and began to hunt the bison and invade their habitat, the population dropped to about 300 bison in the year 1900. Due to farmers and the government setting aside room for the animals to roam, the number has increased to about half a million. With the number of bison continuing to grow, these national animals should be around for a long time to come.
